The Poor Service.

Mrs. Ray Shersley had just returned from a visit to the foreign cruiser that lay at anchor in the harbor of the great American city.

"We had a fine time," she said. "They showed us all over the ship and paid us every attention. We didn't know they had arranged an elegant luncheon for us, and we were agreeably surprised, of course, when the captain invited us into the dining saloon and seated us at a long table spread with everything that could tempt the appetite. I tell you, Mrs. Upson, we enjoyed that luncheon. We didn't have to hurry through it either, and we were waited on with the utmost politeness and cordiality."

"The service was first class, was it?" interrupted Mrs. Upson.

"The service," said Mrs. Shersley, lowering her voice. "Not just was nearly all imitation. I give you my word there was hardly a thing worth carrying away as a souvenir. All I grabbed was this little pickle for, and I do believe it's nothing but, plated ware!" Chicago Tribune.

GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

While dining at one of the hotels recently a Washington girl—according to the Star of that city—said to her escort, "I wish that orchestra would play Schubert's 'Serenade'!" "All we've got to do is to have the waiter tell the orchestra leader," said the man. "But you'd better write it. The waiter will be sure to get the message wrong if you don't."

So on the back of an envelope the young woman wrote, in a beautiful angular hand, her request for Schubert's "Serenade," and told the waiter to take it to the leader. The waiter was gone a long time, but at last he appeared with a foaming beaker. "It took some time," he said apologetically. "I understood you to tell me the message was for the orchestra leader, so I took it to him. He read what you wrote and then laughed, and told me to carry the order to the bar, for that was the place to get a seltzer lemonade." And angular writing had scored another triumph.
